permission of course, should be used to create engagement with customers by targeting them in a personalised manner based on real knowledge of what they like and will come back for time after time.
All this can seem daunting and expensive which is where co-operation with suppliers and buying groups can come in.
Click and Collect is another example, and mixed retailing - a cookshop in a garden centre or a hardware outlet that stocks small domestic appliances - another. A more positive approach from suppliers towards trading with value retailers as destination stores in themselves is also something that has become much more noticeable - and rightly so.
For suppliers, innovation is generally about product and POS development and a willingness to embrace and work with forecasted trends – global and regional – is crucial. This wide-ranging subject covers consumer trends such as those researched and published by BHETA partner Scarlet Opus, but also trends in retail-friendly product presentation whether for online or bricks and mortar retail.
BHETA can offer events and workshops featuring both and it is vital for all players in the market to glean understanding of key topics like outdoor kitchens, privacy, indigo and denim, colour blocking, repetition, and framing (meaning context) – which shows the combination of that same wellbeing with the practicality of a working population where few couples are at home together for sufficient time to enjoy their food aspirations without appliances that will work in their absence.
Maybe the most far-sighted of us should keep an eye on the advancement of smart technology into our kitchens as a result.
opportunities for others. Perhaps maybe – the resulting uncertainties are in themselves unhelpful.
Both suppliers and retailers have some stark choices to make and the decisions may ultimately result in increased retail prices, or possibly even the demise of some players in the market. Being an optimist, I hope that common sense will prevail and that sides reach compromise positions.
