Island Jewels

When she first started making jewelry, she was inspired by the unique style of the island. She wanted to create pieces that were both functional and artistic. She started with simple designs, but as she grew, she began to incorporate more complex elements. Her work is now a blend of traditional island craftsmanship and modern design. She has a passion for her craft and a desire to share her creations with the world.

With her desire to create unique pieces, she initially focused on wholesale accounts. Her first wholesale success was with a store on Balboa Island. "I literally put my stuff in a backpack, got on my bike with my dog, and went down there," says Charick. "I was so nervous, but the shop owner bought every single piece." From there she built a website and trade show in Los Angeles. When asked she replied, "I was after my first tradeshow, what feels like 10 years ago. I came home with a stack of orders and I realized that this may be my work." Today, she is an established jewelry designer who sells her jewelry through hundreds of outlets across the country, including a flagship location in Huntington Beach. The jewelry designer became an icon on Main Street in Huntington Beach after the idea to open a brick and mortar thought.

timing, right? I had a year lease, so I figured that if it didn't work out I could bail. Six years later we were still there!" Initially, her own jewelry line accounted for most of the sales, but she slowly began adding the work of other artists as well, and the shop went on to seasonally rotate work from as many as 100 different artists. For six years, she loved her "little store by the sea." However, she and her new hubby, Ryan, yearned for greener pastures. So in the spring of 2014, the couple left the beach and palm trees of California behind and moved across the country to Nashville, where they opened a new store and studio in the old Motor Works building, a Nashville landmark rich in history. The site has since become an artistic haven, and the halls now house more than a dozen other shops including a haberdashery, a film company, a clothing store, a candle shop, and even a tattoo parlor. It is also home to Antique Archaeology from
